New Year's celebrations didn't spring up overnight. Their origins trace back to ancient civilizations, each contributing unique elements to the traditions we observe today. The Sumerians, as early as 3000 BC, celebrated the New Year with a twelve-day festival marking the beginning of spring planting. The Babylonians followed suit, with their Akitu festival honoring the god Marduk. The ancient Egyptians, meanwhile, linked their New Year's celebrations to the flooding of the Nile, a crucial event for their agricultural cycle. The Romans, with their meticulous calendar system, celebrated the New Year on January 1st, a date that eventually spread across the Western world.
